Not illustrated. 1908 Excerpt: ... life through the treachery of the Barons of Apulia and the Counts of Caserta and Acerra. Shortly afterwards, however, the body of the ill-fated pTince was exhumed by order of Bartolomeo Pignatelli, Archbishop of Cosenza, conveyed beyond the limits of the kingdom, and exposed unburied on the bank of the Rio Verde (probably the modern Castellano, an affluent of the Tronto, p. 212). Dante records this in his Purgatorio (iii. 124-132). Skirting the verge of the town, to the left, we reach on the N. side trajans Triumphant Arch, or the Porta Aurea, dating from 114 A..D., one of the finest and best-preserved Roman structures in S. Italy, and somewhat resembling the Arch of Titus at Rome. It was erected by the Roman senate and people, in expectation of the emperors return from the East, where, however, he died in 116. It is constructed of Greek marble, and is 50 ft. in height, the passage being 27 ft. high. A quadriga with a statue of Trajan once crowned the summit. The reliefs relate to the history of the emperor. Outside. To the left of the inscription. Assembly of the Gods (only half-preserved; Bacchus, Geres, Diana, and Silvanus are recognizable). To the right, Dacia supplicating Trajan. The frieze represents the triumph of Trajan over the Dacians. Below this, on the arch, a River God and Goddess, with Autumn and Winter as putti. Above, to the left, Two representatives of a town (goddess in the background) commended to Trajan by a hero; below, Barbarians before Trajan (headless); between them, Jupiter; above, on the right, Mars conducting Fortuna (with the rudder) to the emperor; below, Treaty with a barbarian country.--Passage, R. Trajan sacrificing to Jupiter; 1. Trajan distributing corn among the people. Above, Trajan crowned by Victory.--Inner Side...
